Occupational Health

Under current Irish Legislation, employers have a responsibility to carry out health surveillance in circumstances where employees are exposed, or likely to be exposed to hazards that may have an effect on their health and Safety through prolonged exposure.

A circumstance where this is likely to be necessary includes but is not limited to the following,

- Activities where manual handling forms a large part of the work,
- Activities which expose employees to prolonged exposure to noise, vibration or other physical agents,
- Activities which may expose employees to chemical or biological agents,
- Activities which may be likely to expose employees to excessive levels of stress,

To assist our clients in meeting their Occupational Health requirements, we provide qualified, competent and trained consultants to provide advice to our clients regarding the following,

- Pre employment medicals,
- Periodic medical reviews ,
- Employee health in relation to specific hazards and tailored to suit your specific needs as a company,
- Medical room and support systems,
- First aid room, systems and training requirements,
- Operation of ancillary emergency equipment.

In addition, Egan Safety Solutions will provide advice to their clients in developing policies to better control hazards that might pose issues to employees health.

- Stress, bullying, harassment, and dignity at work,
- First aid and occupational health policies and procedures,
- Medical emergencies and response procedures,
- Policy development on any other relevant issues pertaining to your company (on request).
